The following sections describe the basics of using Photoshop on a computer screen and a monitor. We've also included other helpful resources, including books that explain Photoshop and related topics. Adjusting a computer monitor for photography Photoshop uses a 16.7 million-pixel RGB display to show images. The computer monitor must be calibrated to create a correct display of colors. The monitor needs to be setup using a tool called the Color Tab and then adjusted (which involves opening a dialog box). You can do the following: * Make sure that the monitor calibration is correct by using the Color Tab. * Use a monitor calibration calibration disk to make sure that the colors are as accurate as possible. You can find a good method for calibrating a monitor through the following steps: 1. Connect your computer to your monitor. 2. Open a program on the computer that allows you to adjust the monitor. In Figure 11-1, the monitor is calibrated. 3. Adjust the monitor using the device for adjusting the picture. In Figure 11-1, the monitor is calibrated. 4. When you're done, save the monitor calibration. You can store a monitor calibration in the following ways: * Save a file on the computer called a monitor calibration profile. When you save the file, you can choose any location to save it to as long as you provide a unique name for the file. You then see the profile image on the desktop, as shown in Figure 11-2. Click the Save As dialog box and navigate to and select the file to save your profile. You can also use the Save As feature to save your files to any location on your computer hard drive, including the desktop or a My Pictures folder. * Create a shortcut to the file on your desktop. Is Music The Answer To The Collapse Of Music - joelrunyon ====== DrHankPym If music is the answer to the collapse of music, how can it be that The US Billboard singles chart ended in 1961 The chart itself ended in early 1973. It was a notable extension of the preceding American Top 40, the first chart whose show was entirely commissioned and presented by Billboard. Before that, Billboard would occasionally throw together a small panel to "rate" records in the way they usually judged new releases. The first noteworthy chart, though, was simply a section of each week's paper that sorted the week's "Top Pop" records by the numbers they'd sold. The charts thus appeared to be a collection of records, not an aggregation of opinions. ------ manish Great headline -- title needs some work. It's not music -- music is a collapse. ~~~ Gratsby Is the music industry going to "collapse"? I do not think so. ~~~ akronim Maybe it's just me, but you seem to be implying that "music" itself is going to collapse. This seems quite extreme to me. Music is going to still exist, people will still listen to music and buy music and that's all that matters. ~~~ Gratsby I was arguing against the title of the post. I believe the original title of the post was "Is Music the Answer to the Collapse of Music?" ~~~ DrHankPym It's still not music. ------ DrHankPym Best of all, it's light on content.
