Fluorescence microscopy for the diagnosis of oncocytic renal tumors in fine-needle aspirates. Oncocytic renal tumors account for 2% to 6% of renal tumors and often exhibit characteristic histologic features of increased cytoplasmic eosinophilia. They are often mimicked on fine-needle aspiration (FNA) cytology as benign oncocytic neoplasms. Two cases, a nonfunctioning oncocytic papillary renal cell carcinoma (RCC) in a 79-year-old woman and a 10-mm and a 15-mm oncocytic RCCs in a 60-year-old man, have been shown on cytologic and FNA material to have heterogeneous and homogeneous nuclear features, respectively. In both cases, flow cytometry for DNA analysis, clinical follow-up, and surgical pathology were used to confirm oncocytic morphology. For the first patient, a paraffin-embedded surgically resected case of oncocytic RCC demonstrated a hypercellular, dark-brown, "coffee-bean" appearance. Fluorescence microscopy, which was used for the second patient, revealed fluorescently bright cytoplasm and nuclear labeling patterns that were consistent with oncocytic RCC. For oncocytic renal tumors, a diagnosis of oncocytic RCC should be made only after histologic examination of the resected specimen. Fluorescence microscopy may be used to confirm the oncocytic nature of FNA smears and to identify the tumor type when conventional cytomorphology is insufficient.# SPDX-License-Identifier: GPL-2.0 obj-$(CONFIG_DM_VIDEO) += dm-video.o obj-$(CONFIG_DM_VIDEO) += dm-video-pat.o
