A website that I used to have to review immigration regulations has been shut down. My office is in the process of requesting a subpoena, but I am concerned that this will simply be denied. The website was not illegal or fraudulent; it was based upon a public document, namely the United States Citizenship and Immigration Services Handbook CH-5 (USCIS) - Application and Petition Fees. It was merely an education tool for my students. The judge who will be handling our case has the power to find that the subpoena was not properly served, that the information is not relevant to our case, or that it violates the judicial canons. Is there any room for appeal in this situation? A: In general, a judge can act in a manner consistent with the laws of the land. They are not required to do so, and normally will not, but they are not forbidden to do so. Not all judges are created equal. And sometimes different judges will have different opinions on the same law, so if they come to differing conclusions on a matter of law, the issue may end up on appeal. I'm not saying you should be confident of this, but that is the general rule. Generally, a party must request the right to appeal the ruling of the judge. A judge is not obliged to provide that right, but if they do not, they have effectively precluded an appeal by the person challenging the ruling. If they do provide a right to appeal, it can be limited, so if the party is disgruntled, they may not have any appeal rights at all, which would make a judge's decision final and not subject to appeal. If you have an objection, it is better to put it in writing before you appeal, and explain why you consider the objection valid. If you are unconvinced that a judge will refuse your request for appeal, you should ask a friend or family member to assist you. 570a42141b
