I like that it's still available as an alternative to Norton Ghost, even though Norton Ghost is the preferred option. Toddler Keys requires the user to edit a config file which is stored in the registry. There are too many other user-configurable options for this to be overly convenient, but the advantages of doing it this way are that the config file is in the registry, and that any changes to the config file can be synchronized to all user accounts. The config file also allows for all sorts of use-case specific restrictions. For instance, Toddler Keys can start in Vista with its user account, but run as a service with the Local System account.
