In one case, a young woman told me her bank had blocked access to her checking account and she was left with a few thousand dollars in her account. This is when I learned that even after so-called "high-tech" measures are taken to protect your personal information, your stolen identity can still be utilized to your detriment. To date, there have been more than a dozen incidents where people are being told their identity has been stolen. To further complicate matters, sometimes the suspected thief is charged with theft, even though the victim hasn't been told there was any breach. Here is the common scenario: A man visits his bank to open a new account and a teller requests a government-issued ID. The man gives the teller his Social Security card and driver's license. The teller places a temporary access code and account number on a deposit slip, which he uses to later transfer a check from his existing account. Once the check is deposited, the man receives a letter saying his check has been returned because of insufficient funds. The check is cleared by his bank and the new account is funded by a check in the man's name. This is not a report on a scam that is occurring. There are legitimate reasons for a check to be returned. The problem is that the unauthorized person who has your identity is now in control of your account. This scenario isn't likely to occur.
