A comparison of aerobic physical activity, upper-body resistance exercise, and combined aerobic-resistance exercise interventions on body composition, maximal strength, and aerobic fitness. To compare changes in body composition, strength, and aerobic performance achieved through participation in a combined aerobic and resistance exercise program with those achieved by participation in an aerobic exercise program alone and by participation in a resistance exercise program alone. This study was a longitudinal, nonrandomized trial. Subjects were sedentary overweight women (age, 46 +/- 10 yr; body mass index, 32 +/- 4 kg x m(-2)). Subjects attended 12 weekly training sessions over 8 wk and were then advised to exercise for 2 additional 6-wk periods to promote long-term adherence. During the initial 4 wk of training, subjects were assigned to one of three training groups: (a) an aerobic training group (AT), (b) a resistance exercise group (RT), or (c) a combined aerobic-resistance exercise group (CER). Subjects in the AT group completed 60-min training sessions twice a week that consisted of 30-min cycling at 50-65% peak oxygen consumption (VO₂peak) and 30-min e79caf774b doing? I have read the man pages of malloc and free several times but I don't really understand the following example: `int *p = malloc(8); // Ok`

`int p = (int)malloc(8); // Ok`
`int p = (int)malloc(8 * sizeof(*p)); // Ok`
`int *p = malloc(8 * sizeof(*p)); // Ok, why??`
`int *p = malloc(8); // Ok, but why??` Why the second line returns a pointer to a pointer? (Maybe I don't fully understand the syntax). Can anyone explain why? A: Why the second line returns a pointer to a pointer? It returns a pointer to the initial pointer `int *p; ... int *p = malloc(8); // p is initialised to point to a memory block`
`int q = p; // p becomes a pointer to p` It returns a pointer to the returned pointer `int *p; ... int q = malloc(8); // q is initialised to point to a memory block`
`int r = malloc(8 * sizeof *q); // r is initialised to point to q` A: If you want to call malloc, you must use a cast, so that the compiler knows what your intentions are. `int *p = malloc(8 * sizeof(*p));` is a pointer to a pointer. `int *q = malloc(8);` is a pointer to a pointer to int, so it is the same as `int (*p)[8];` or `int *p; int q = malloc(8 * sizeof(*p));` `p = q;` the first one is

(a) The gas pressure is applied to push the valve and the valve is open automatically. (b) With no gas pressure, the valve is closed. In this way, even if the gas does not have a gas pressure, you can use the pressure. 6.5 Function of the water cylinder pump The water pump works to supply water from the water tank to the device. When the water pump is not working, the output is reduced. The pressure of the pump is not enough so it is not high output. The water pressure changes. The pressure
