To see how the technology delivers on its promise, we sat down with Lewis Price from EA Sports, who shared his thoughts on the new tech, player-reviews, and more. How would you describe HyperMotion Technology? Lewis Price (LP): The main concept of HyperMotion is that as we get new data from each match, we use the data from the real player's match to provide us with an individualized experience. Rather than us trying to collect a lot of data from players and not all of that data aligning, we use data from a real-life player. It's pretty deep and complex stuff. It's worked out for all the players that we used, such as Thiago Alcântara and Radamel Falcao for example. It is not an exact copy because the way that they play is different from each other, but they all work incredibly well. The details of the simulation around their movements are superb. How are you actually using motion capture data for gameplay? LP: We use the data from the players that performed in the real match to power the way the players play. The idea is that we can re-create a match and use it as a basis for training players in a development environment. We can give players the motion data that they have for training and then we can use the results from that match, as we test things in the beta, or in this case, in the match. How difficult was it to capture all 22 players? How much of the data and motion we can use depends on player injuries. LP: All of the data collection takes place before, during and after the match, rather than the players wearing the suits and running around. The data collection is pretty quick, but if we capture a player whilst he is injured, we still get the injury data. The motion capture data for all of the players was done before they played the match. What happens with the real-life players that we use for the feedback is that we can't always know what the full match will be like until they play it. We are constantly capturing player data from matches that never reach the final. How much do you change things up on the gameplay? LP: The aim is to make the gameplay best in-line with what they are doing in the real match. If we have a player that is attacking
