Now eight states have their own dedicated marijuana tax revenue streams: a lottery in Massachusetts, Alaska, Oregon, and the District of Columbia; taxes for marijuana cultivation and marijuana retail in Washington state; and a tax on marijuana sales in Colorado. Using data from Gallup's Health Tracking Poll, we're projecting how the impact of these new and continuing states on state revenue could affect the country as a whole. Here are the states that are estimating state revenue from legal marijuana: California ($2.8 billion in FY2017): Marijuana taxes in California can be used to support a number of government-provided services, including K-12 education, mental health services, substance abuse treatment, and more. Michigan (an additional $190 million in FY2017): As Michigan, a state that is in a number of movements toward legalizing marijuana, legalizes the drug, we project an additional $190 million in marijuana-related state tax revenue. Massachusetts ($153 million in FY2017): Massachusetts, where recreational and medical marijuana are legal in the Bay State, collected $153 million in 2017 revenue on marijuana. That's part of a projected $347 million of state revenue on marijuana this year. Alaska ($81 million in FY2017): Alaska legalized marijuana in 2014, and the state now expects to collect $82 million in marijuana tax
