The general mechanism by which an HLA-A or HLA-B type antigen is transported to the cell surface is well understood. The mechanism by which a non-A or non-B class I HLA antigen is transported to the cell surface has not yet been well-characterized (Roberts et al, (1982) J. Exp. Med. 155:1450-1457). Further, the mechanism by which a class I HLA antigen is transported to the cell surface is still not well-understood. The general transport mechanism by which a class I HLA antigen is presented on the surface of an antigen-presenting cell (APC) has been characterized in some detail. The class II HLA antigen, for example, is recognized by a helper T-lymphocyte, and binding of the class II molecule to the class II-related receptor (Leu 2) leads to transport of the class II antigen into the endosome. The class I HLA 0cc13bf012

A man who only knew one thing to do with water was how to make it flow, Boyd Bean was quick to find a unique set of skills. In a culture where skill-sets change every generation, the unique combination of traits that, from an early age, made Boyd Bean a contributor to the success of his family—and a difference-maker in his community—will stay with him to this day. Putting himself forward at the University of South Carolina in 1982, Boyd worked for Dr. Buzzy Schmitt as an assistant volleyball coach. Many others began to take notice. Boyd ‘s natural gifts, instinctive techniques and deep passion for the game helped take South Carolina to consecutive Final Four appearances, while simultaneously raising the national profile of volleyball. At age 17, Boyd Bean began a career in sports administration, moving from administrator to administrator. But there was one sport that held an eternal and indelible affection: American Football. The University of Florida opened the floodgates on an unexpected career as an administrator, and in 2007, Chris Boyd was
