Adobe is releasing a new version of Photoshop to align with the new features that it has created in the latest versions of PS. This is the version CS5. Any version of Photoshop that is older will be given this new version address. This not only makes things easier but also it makes more sense with other product updates. This puts Photoshop up as close as the current version of Lightroom as well. Before the update though I was thinking of upgrading lightroom and using that to import my stuff from cards, flickr, and last years work. I got the impression that I should have that version of Photoshop. Now, I'll have to look at that version of Photoshop again to see what's new because I honestly didn't pay to much attention. The new features and the additional functionality are more visible and easy to make use of. The downside to the new updates is that the new update isn't for the site that recommended it at all. Moreover, you can't import flash content that you create in an earlier version of Photoshop to these versions. It's a little tricky and a lot of information to swallow. The last benefit is that as a freelance photographer, you're frequently trying to sell your photos. Being able to perform all of your mass collecting and grouping abilities directly inside of Photoshop allows you to take advantage of the advanced features that will definitely help you sell your portfolio of images. Whether or not you have the purchase price is irrelevant, the ability to use Photoshop as a lode is definitely the most appealing feature to me. This review would not have been as complete without mentioning the training environment. In short, it's very awesome. Beyond just the usability, the Photoshop Crash Course program is incredibly well-written and structured. I would highly recommend it to anyone who wants to learn how to use Photoshop CC on their own or as a sales professional.
