Green Industrial A green industrial design is a combination of sustainable development and industrial production with a long-term use. Green industrial product with its natural environment is the human and living spaces are a less harmful and could be gentler to the environment. For the future, green industrial product, people will become more and more reasonable and smarter use of resources.

History 19th Century Because of the risk of sanitary and health risks and environmental pollution, many types of industrial products made from combustible materials, such as most clothing, car tires, wallpaper, or furniture made from plastics, wood, oil, etc., was prohibited. In the mid-19th century, William Templeton designed a "sanitary" shoe with a wooden, fused bottom and soles, to avoid spreading contaminated materials. In 1867, Charles Goodyear made a vulcanized rubber, which became the first "green" products, causing the garment industry to shift from leather to plastics for the first time.

20th Century In the early 20th century, some scientists and engineers used environmental and pollution considerations to design new products, such as Houdini, first of the so-called "green revolution", which invented the first chemical fertilizers and pesticides were chemical fertilizers. The U.S. introduced environmentally-friendly technologies after World War II, such as the Tennessee Valley Authority (TVA) to use electricity to generate. Walter Reuther, founder of the United Auto Workers union, initiated the "Buy American" platform and in the late 1950s and early 1960s, many car companies began to develop automobiles. 21st Century Sustainable industrial products have appeared in recent years, such as the Ecomodernism. Its current work is to innovate the "green" industrial products with the purpose of developing a more sustainable future. One of the Ecomodernism was Joseph Stiglitz, who won the 2001 Nobel prize in economics for his work on the "green" theory. Ecomodernism project also include the Ecomodernism Energy, Ecomodernism Water, Ecomodernism Forest, Ecomodernism Islands, Ecomodernism Ocean, Ecomodernism Land, Ecomodern
