Sawyer Virgil Albert Sawyer (1862–1947) was an educator and publisher who was the 3rd and 5th director of the Alabama Board of Education. He was also a practicing lawyer and married to the daughter of the secretary of state of Alabama, Samuel T. Wells. Sawyer served as Alabama superintendent of schools from 1897 until 1902 during the Roosevelt administration. During his tenure, the Gold Bar School was established in Tuscaloosa and became the fifth segregated African-American university in the state. Sawyer also elevated a "one-room schoolhouse" to a "two-room schoolhouse", and he closed several rural schools and consolidated many others. In 1903, Alabama passed the state's Racial Integrity Act which effectively banned miscegenation and the intermixing of certain races. The act was overturned by the U.S. Supreme Court in a 5-to-4 decision in Strauder v. West Virginia but was deemed constitutional by the Alabama legislature in 1908. Sawyer pressed for a new constitutional convention to implement racial segregation. The convention was held, and Alabama entered a period of racial polarization and segregation that continued until the U.S. Supreme Court's ruling in Brown v. Board of Education in 1954. In his later years, he was known as a staunch segregationist, due to his support of such measures including the state law which prohibited interracial marriage. He served as editor of the Tuscaloosa Advocate for the remainder of his life. The final report of the Board of Education on July 18, 1939, stated that from the previous year until the American society of 19,000,000, of which 50,000,000 are colored; there are hardly more than 70,000,000 Gentiles."
