Conventionally, a solid-state image sensing device of the CMOS (Complementary Metal Oxide Semiconductor) type, among others, has been generally used as an image sensor; see document 1 (for example, page 38) and document 2 (for example, page 6). The solid-state image sensing device of the CMOS type is an image sensor that has, in a pixel array of a first-conductivity-type well formed on a silicon substrate, a pixel MISFET (Metal Insulator Semiconductor Field Effect Transistor) each of which has a PD (Photo Diode) substrate formed in a second-conductivity-type well formed on the first-conductivity-type well, a readout gate for reading out photo charges generated in the PD substrate to a signal line located in the first-conductivity-type well, and a trench capacitor formed in the vicinity of the readout gate. The following method has been proposed in order to block the influence of noise components superposed upon an image sensing signal of the aforesaid solid-state image sensing device. Specifically, a method has been proposed, for example, in Japanese Patent Application No. Hei-8-130878, in which the influence of noise components superposed onto the image sensing signal in the time axis direction is canceled by setting a threshold value of the pixel MISFET for writing photo charges generated by a photo diode to a pixel capacitor to have a predetermined level, by shifting a level of the image sensing signal of a pixel having the threshold value of the pixel MISFET higher than a reference level by an amount corresponding to that of the noise component superposed on the noise level is shifted to a positive level of the image sensing signal.
