At "24-week scan," one fetus (1/5) with fetal meconium ileus (FMI) was diagnosed as having prolapse of the terminal ileum and cystic dilatation of the terminal ileum. Postnatal ultrasound on the fifth day of life revealed meconium peritonitis, leading to laparotomy with subtotal colectomy. The other four (4/5) fetuses with FMI were observed clinically with serial ultrasonographic examinations. None of the clinical cases had meconium peritonitis, as demonstrated by ultrasonography. Two babies with FMI died of different co-morbidities, whereas the other two were clinically normal and healthy at a follow-up of 5.5 years. To assess the outcome of the two approaches (surgery versus clinical observation) in the management of FMI. A single-centre retrospective comparison. The clinical data of patients from two obstetric centres in Hong Kong were collected. All cases were managed as a part of routine clinical care. Fetuses diagnosed with FMI were identified and the perinatal outcome recorded. Twenty-four fetuses with FMI were managed during the study period. Seventeen underwent surgery (Group A), whereas seven were managed clinically with serial ultrasound examinations (Group B). The number of meconium peritonitis episodes was 4 in the surgical group and 0 in the observation group. There were 2.6 episodes of meconium staining, with the last instance of meconium staining occurring on postnatal day 6. The gestational age at delivery was 27.3 weeks in Group A and 28.1 weeks in Group B (P = 0.7). In Group A, three (17.6%) of the 17 babies were delivered preterm due to obstetric emergencies while all babies in Group B were delivered at term or near term. In Group A, there was no report of meconium ileus as an antenatal complication, whereas in Group B, meconium
