Histamine has been suggested as a neurotransmitter in the vertebrate central nervous system. In this study, we examined the effects of histamine on the survival and the morphology of cerebellar granule cells. Histamine protected cerebellar granule cells against the toxicity of high K+ and the glutamate receptor agonists kainic acid and N-methyl-D-aspartate. However, histamine did not protect the cells against the toxicity of excitatory amino acids present in physiological concentrations. Histamine protected cerebellar granule cells by preventing mitochondrial depolarization, membrane potential dissipation, swelling, and reduced binding of rhodamine 123. In addition, histamine prevented the translocation of the apoptotic factor, Bax, from the cytosol to mitochondria. All these effects were associated with a decrease in the extent of DNA fragmentation and the number of TUNEL-labeled cells. Taken together, the present data suggest that histamine, in addition to its function as an endocrine and/or neurotransmitter, could act as a neuroprotective molecule and protect cerebellar granule cells in response to oxidative stress. For your information, I'm not interested in knowing what I can do to help. I'm not interested in seeing how many fans I have and what my latest Tweet says. I'm not interested in the ratings or how many times the clip of my pre-game interview airs on ESPN or ESPN2. My main goal is to reach as many people as possible. I want to tell people about this great sport and do my part in drawing an ever-increasing crowd.
