The story begins in the fascinating land of Pahkwa. The benevolent, peaceful, and relatively advanced. The people there know nothing about the barbarian world across the sea. One day, the king is buried in his town, after finding the mother and son dead. His sole surviving son, Gywell, is being brought up by his own mother, to keep the dynasty. The death toll rises in the area around the grave, and the locals accuse a stranger. When Gwywell suddenly disappears, his father orders his search. He is later found by another wanderer, a girl, told: "Who is this King, who is strong enough to kill the Devil?" – At a later point, she herself disappears, too. When the boy and his father arrive in the neighboring tribe, they find out that the inhabitants of the mountain on the horizon, the head man there, possesses supernatural powers, including the ability to move by the power of the wind. He tries to protect Gywell's happiness by informing him of the dangers in the future, and to bring his father as a friend to the magical tribe. All of a sudden, with a fight with the Devil, Gywell and his father are thrown into a different world. However, this world is no enchanted fairy tale kingdom. There is neither happily-ever-after, nor magic – it's reality in which every struggle between good and evil must be fought, to save the first, and save the last. I hope you will enjoy this adventure. ## What's new in Two Falls (Nishu Takuatshina):

My garden season has come and gone. I did get to plant a small bit this morning, but I was hoping to use up both Mother's Day and the Memorial Day weekend with gardening. Fortunately, there's always a party for me to attend; I go to exotic little contests, party like a rock star, try new recipes and pick up new crafts. It's hard to make a garden a priority each spring. We just get too busy to get out there as often as needed and at least three times a season. This year my garden woes were compounded by me playing around with the weather a bit too much. So, while the cherry blossoms were just popping into place, I was looking at too many plants still in the ground. By the time Memorial Day rolled around, there was too many weeds (mainly one invasive wildflower that is totally out of control) and not enough sun or rain. It doesn't take three different crops and six different zucchini plants (25 to be exact) to make a gardener happy. Most of the garden had by then gone into fruitless hibernation. Then the weather turned hot and dry. The weatherman was right. Despite the unfamiliar weather, I decided to rip out all my plants and start over. I worked like crazy for three or four days straight, and the sun stayed out the whole time. By the time we got back from our trip to Lake Inez, I had my plants in the ground in two. I began blogging about my garden in April. I hadn't posted about it in late October and I was able to peek out three posts all season long. None of my work in the winter was fruitless - my work went into keeping weeds down, building things, doing the laundry, etc. I'm happy about that. At the same time, I wish I had started blogging earlier. While I'm proud of what I accomplished with my growing space, I'm also disappointed in myself for frittering so many hours away on something I was ultimately unable to enjoy at its best. As I write this, I'm watching final cut footage of a movie I'm in. As expected, the director is an uninspiring wimp who tries too hard to be cool. At one point, he comments on the actresses' hair... referring to it as girls. Whatever.
