Optical components, such as microarrays, have become increasingly important in the manufacture of chemicals. For example, proteins are essentially biological macromolecules which carry out biological functions. Proteins and their interactions with other biomolecules are important to human life for a variety of reasons, including, as examples, control of cell division or growth, molecular recognition, and immune response. Proteins are defined as organic polymers of amino acids. In 1963, Pauling and Corey were awarded the Nobel Prize in Chemistry for their work on the structure and electronic properties of conjugated double chains of organic molecules. These studies were formulated around a model of polypeptide chains as a sequence of alpha amino acids, linked together through peptide bonds, in which the alpha carbon atom of an amino acid and the nitrogen atom of the amide group are bonded and comprise a polypeptide chain or backbone. As a result of further research, amino acids were found to have asymmetric carbon atoms: a carbon atom bonded to a hydrogen atom and to a hydroxyl group (a carboxyl group) is called an "alpha" carbon atom, and the corresponding carbon atom bound to a hydrogen atom and to a hydroxyl group is called an "omega" carbon atom. Each of the naturally occurring amino acids
