More particularly, the invention relates to an illumination apparatus for use with a headlamp of a motor vehicle which can be controlled to adjust the intensity of light radiated in a desired fashion. In a modern motor vehicle, the headlamps are operated by a headlamp control apparatus, which is also used to adjust the intensity of the light from the headlamps. The headlamp control apparatus is generally called an illumination apparatus. One of the factors affecting the intensity of light radiated from the headlamp is the electrical power applied to the headlamp. If the electrical power is increased, the light intensity is correspondingly increased. On the other hand, if the electrical power is decreased, the light intensity is correspondingly decreased. In the past, the illumination apparatus was constructed of a relatively large number of expensive components such as electronic circuits, resistors, capacitors, transistors and condensers, in an attempt to obtain good illumination control. Unfortunately, the prior art illumination apparatus, despite its use of the above-mentioned expensive components, failed to achieve the desired intensity of light. In order to overcome this shortcoming, it has been proposed that the illumination apparatus can be constructed of a plurality of smaller parts. See Japanese Patent Disclosure No. 63-135895.
