The country has been rocked by accusations of sexual harassment against Hollywood producer Harvey Weinstein and dozens of prominent men, with revelations that The New York Times had helped expose them. A disgraced Hollywood producer and a former journalist who later worked with Harvey Weinstein have lost their jobs for sexual harassment, in an apparent effort by the newspaper to protect its story from being buried. Matt Lauer and Charlie Rose resigned as co-hosts of NBC's "Today" show after one of the network's investigative journalists told executives that she had been sexually harassed by them. In a show of support, Ms Rosen was named the first female president of the network by the news division's top executives on Wednesday. "The network is fully committed to providing a safe and inclusive workplace for our employees and everyone who is part of the 'Today' family," NBC News Chairman Andrew Lack said. The decision followed a long, painful, many months process during which women reported their allegations to co-workers, journalists at the Times, lawyers at Covington & Burling, and the newspaper's top executives. On Monday, the Times said in a statement that it stood behind its journalists on the Weinstein story, and that the paper "stands by its story and the story was accurate." The paper's leader,
