Q: Efficient scale out for N sequences with known overlap between  $N/2+1$  sequences? I have N sequences, each is between 0 and 1. I would like to divide the data into groups of subsets so that within each group  $1/N$  in sequences are adjacent, and the different  $N/2+1$  subgroups are "adjacent". Not all N sequences necessarily have the same number of subgroups of size  $N/2+1$ . I thought this problem should be solved with bit operations, but I don't see it. I can imagine a possible algorithm that proceeds by computing the sum, cumulative sum, and difference of each sequence with itself, but that doesn't seem efficient. Algorithm: Let N be our size (size of sequence or N could be 1000). Let m be a list of {0,1}-lists of length  $N/2+1$ . For each  $k = 1$  to N compute  $(\text{sequence}(2k-1) - \text{cumulative\_sum}(k-1) * 2 - \text{difference}(k-1)) \bmod 2$  return the element of the {0,1}-lists m[k] which corresponds to that sum. Use of Vertex Cover to make the problem more tractable is not a viable solution since the problem has a time limit of 100ms (presumably on an Arduino board). A: Following other's suggestions I am now using RedBlackTree: `vec2 v=...; int a; bitmap b=getbitmap(v); // First find all subsets having as an extension the subspace where a is at 0. // b.zerobyte keeps an index of all of them, and the list stores the values. // If b.b[j]!= 1, then there's an extra sequence. for(int j=0;b[j]!=1;++j) { a=b.xorbits(j,b.w`

What's new in Elden Ring:

Read more...tag:>Stupid thing is, it's not exactly clear why this game came into being. Is it some fly-by-night attempt to cash in on the battle-system seen in Diablo III, but fail to make monetary sense? There was some investigation into the design work that went into Mythender and its components, and it doesn't really come across as a thing to play. It's more like an RPG with a few decked-out Diablo features slapped on, but those features are disproportionately large and not so fun. Diablo players may find an easy sense of connection in the concept, but from my limited two-day gameplay, it feels like the result of someone's favorite weekend hack-and-slash featuring not only some neat characters and classes, but some slightly more interesting terrain. Perhaps it's some kind of quest to create more of whatever it is that inspired the pre-release interest, but it's certainly not on anyone's radar. It's something nobody would want to play with their friends for more than six hours or so in a day. Kotaku has some first impressions of the game. Some cool features, like the ability to swap from a Paladin perspective to a Sorcerer one during a fight, or getting insanely powerful weapons in its masterworks. So far the worst things I've seen in a game about swords and spells, it's just a buenos dias to look like a fun one-on-one. There's a dozen reasons why making a Diablo clone isn't smart, from the design problems to the the hard sell. If they're looking at it, I'd recommend they hire someone like Braid's Matt Uelmen, or look into the Half-Life 2 Source engine and learn how games are made.

may be classified as perennial, seasonal, or intermittent. The seasonal form is divided into vascular, itching, and papillomatous conjunctivitis. Drugs and allergens, including food ingredients and insecticides, are important causes of allergic conjunctivitis. Diagnosis is clinical and includes ophthalmologic examination, tear testing, and the response to selected diagnostic tests. Pathophysiologic mechanisms of itching and inflammation are discussed in relation to their treatment. South Australia and Western Australia are serious players when it comes to building the next generation of ultra-fast mobile broadband. Access mobile technology in the home, at work and on the go, while still maintaining control and independence at the new Optus 4G mobile home in Salisbury Avenue, Nedlands. It's the latest to be completed in the Optus 4G service. Photo: Supplied. North Adelaide University researchers are at the forefront of a ground breaking project to develop ultra-fast mobile broadband. The project will bring the cost down, while delivering greater speed and coverage to homes, businesses and on the go. Scientists and entrepreneurs at UQ Medicine and Dentistry are leading the project, with Optus and the Australian Bureau of Statistics as key partners. Dr Brian Moylan from UQ said mobile phone networks could be a big part of a future infrastructure for ultra-fast connections. "I think the mobile phone industry and broadband technology are going to be merged with new infrastructure and communications services, so we can use mobile networks as part of our backbones," he said. "We have been in this area for a long time and other countries have done this before, so there's not a lot of technology in this. "The challenge is to try to get down prices, have more coverage and better speeds." UQ is using high-end optics-based lasers to measure the speed and strength of light when it travels through the atmosphere, giving a better picture of the extent of mobile towers that service the area. Dr Moylan said the work was helping researchers discover how to achieve faster speeds to less populated areas. "We need to be doing ground-breaking research to find new technologies which can be used in the future to save a lot of time, energy and money," he
