study were: severe occurrence of asthma-like reactions, no change in the efficacy of allergen-specific therapy, but a higher risk of induced allergic asthma. The frequency of local and general reactions of the Allergy to latex were significantly higher compared to the control group and other allergic diseases. It is concluded that in spite of the fact that specific immunotherapy is a well tolerated and effective method it should not be administered to infants. The high sensitivity of these patients to local and general reactions may be caused by the lack of immunological tolerance induced by the lymph-nodes dependent mechanism. This invention relates to the field of the structures and tools used by an individual installing a door in its frame, and more particularly relates to a rotating cart used in such installations. Conventional rolling shutter installations require that the individual installer typically use a rolling cart to move the door from the floor to the inside of the doorframe and then back again. The cart used in such installations must be both stable and secure for safety. Additionally, it is
