Moreover, water also has a tendency to dissolve the additive, and thereby partially or completely eliminating its effectiveness. Tests have shown that if a particular additive, such as, for example, an anti-foaming agent is added to a lubricating oil, that the effective life of the additive is very short, i.e., from about four to six months. This is due to the fact that during the first six months of operation of the engine, the air/oil mixture is drawn into the cylinder on the intake stroke of the piston, the compression stroke, and the combustion stroke of the piston. On the compression stroke of the piston, the air/oil mixture enters the cylinder, and then on the intake stroke of the piston, the mixture is drawn into the cylinder and compressed. At the end of the combustion stroke of the piston, the fuel is mixed with air, the mixture is compressed, and the flame is ignited within the cylinder. The entire compression stroke, combustion stroke and intake stroke are repeated continuously over and over again in the combustion cycle of the engine. During these three strokes, the engine cannot run without air. As a result, and as stated above, there is a need to periodically replace the additive in the oil. The need to periodically replace additives such as anti-foaming agents and antioxidants adds expense and other problems to the lubricating oil. Thus, a need exists to prolong the life of 6d1f23a050
