Investigation of the mechanical properties of hydrogels containing 5-FU, ATRA, and DNR using an in vitro drug release model and a compression test.

Two polymeric drug-loaded hydrogels were developed, and their physicochemical and mechanical properties were investigated. The main purpose of the study was to assess the feasibility of using the mechanically tunable hydrogels as a drug-delivery system. The two hydrogels were formulated using 5-fluorouracil (5-FU), all trans-retinoic acid (ATRA), and mitoxantrone (DNR) as model drugs. The influence of the amount of each drug on the physicochemical and mechanical properties of the systems was investigated. The polymers used for gel formulation were synthesized by a multi-step process, using atom transfer radical polymerization (ATRP) as the initiation method. Poly(ethylene glycol) (PEG) was used as a non-toxic and biocompatible crosslinker. Dose-dependent drug release profiles were obtained for both hydrogels. The release kinetics of 5-FU and ATRA from the hydrogel depended on the amount of drug loaded in the system. The release of the drugs from the hydrogels occurred within 24 h and up to 96 h. The hydrogels exhibited highly compressible mechanical behavior and sustained drug release. // Copyright © 2016 Alan A. A. Donovan & Brian W.
