Human cytomegalovirus (HCMV), an important human pathogen, is the leading viral cause of birth defects, and remains the leading cause of sensorineural hearing loss in congenitally infected children. HCMV primary infection of the fetus, even during early gestation, can cause intrauterine growth retardation, microcephaly, and other congenital anomalies. HCMV infection can also induce a wide range of secondary conditions including blindness, mental retardation and neurodegeneration in immunocompromised individuals. HCMV infection may be controlled by human neutralizing antibodies, but this defense mechanism is of limited value in immunocompromised individuals, as well as in other clinical situations. Although a vaccine is not currently available, the efficacy of antiviral drugs has been enhanced by development of long-term antiviral therapy. Ganciclovir, a known nucleoside analog and HCMV DNA polymerase inhibitor, has been used successfully to treat HCMV infections and congenital disease, and is currently a first-line treatment for immunocompromised patients. Its major drawback is its cytotoxicity, which requires daily dosage for life-long therapy. Although an oral formulation of ganciclovir is currently being investigated, there is no guarantee that this new formulation will demonstrate better therapeutic efficacy, while it might also have worse adverse effects. Development of more efficient anti-CMV agents is, thus, urgently needed. Murine CMV (MCMV) is an important model system for human CMV 6d1f23a050
