The case of the Woodland and Riverside professional basketball teams and the reclamation of their championship name was a bit of a mess, but the seven-man working group that recently created a new city-sanctioned league (the Xtreme Professional Basketball League) is aiming for a cleaner start. The new league will feature more than a dozen teams around the state, but the inaugural season will feature just four teams -- and that won't change in later years. But some have wondered why the Woodland-Riverside teams, which once had longstanding city-sanctioned contracts and logos, would have to start afresh. The Xtreme Professional Basketball League explains it best in a press release sent out this week: "Cincinnati, Dayton and Columbus were once dominated by one team, the Cincinnati Slammers (now the Swishahouse Trotters). What if the Woodland-Riverside area was once dominated by just one team, the Riverside Bremen? Since there will be less than 10 teams in the inaugural season (one is a travel team), the de facto champion was awarded a team. "It makes no sense to have one team dominate a city. It simply creates unrealistic expectations among the fans, players and business owners of that city. The only way to make a true championship for the city is for the city to support multiple teams with equal support. That means fans and owners should rally
