The Sunlight Foundation has an interesting story about how a bureaucracy has a long tradition of ignoring and being unaware of technological advancements which will be necessary to thwart a national security threat. The story points out that during the Obama administration the White House failed to secure the cloud computing networks which host much of the government's information. This was despite the fact that it has been open-sourcing these technology and creating the potential security vulnerabilities which gave rise to this breach. It is only thanks to the Bush administration that a cloud computing strategy was implemented, which then spread throughout the government and ensured that all of the secure cloud computing networks were secured and updated to provide continued security, and the same can be said for the Internet. Without this by the Obama administration, we would have been at a significant risk to the security of our information.
