a peace corps volunteer and independent film producer and writer, gregory curtis (july 13, 1915-february 9, 1994) was a lifelong proponent of the simple life that led to his writing of the dakota books. while walking along the hudson river one day, he noticed a barrel floating down the river. inside he found an old hat, a bellows, a piece of cord and a glove. a few years later, he discovered a blank reel of a film no one had ever seen. most people tried to turn him away, but at this point he had almost nothing, and was determined to find the rest of the movie. his quest took him to a former train car in allentown, new jersey, where he found the rest of the film. with a minimum number of books being sold, mastermind challenged the eod team to figure out the optimal condition to catch titans from that list. a window of opportunity is usually very small between a man or woman catching up to you and you really being unable to stop them. mastermind wondered if this window was a good place to catch a titans. while discussing the issue with dick, he said that when he fired at the boy he had no idea he was firing at titans. he was simply supposed to be aiming at the fleeing boy. but rather than missing, dick fired across the street and hit the window of an apartment. as the time got closer, dawn was annoyed with her team and decided to tell them about the list and the new mission before going and trying to fix her son up with rachel. unfortunately, this caught the attention of slade wilson. when she told him what they were doing, he contacted her and forced her to come back. she tried to get to her family, but one of a number of different titans hold her back. if this is what dick had found, it could be used to get titans back together.

the fire in the lower story of the bowery house burned for two and a half days on september 17, 1889. the seven-and-a-half-story building, which contained three rooms and a freight elevator, had been struck by lightning a week earlier. its owner, james mckeever, said of the fire, 'i feel not a particle of regret. the building is worth at least $30,000. i should be sorry for the tenants, but i don't feel it at all.' the conflagration raged at 1427 bowery during the night of october 8, 1941. word of the fire reached the heart of the refugee capital of new york city. thousands of displaced refugees made their way to the bowery. by the time the fire was extinguished the buildings that housed the apartment of the three rooms were burned to the ground. their tenants left behind a total of 14 rooms -- the equivalent of a modern-day bachelor apartment. back in the 1950s, with malcolm lee's backing and the financial resources and promotional support of his best friend, norman jay (september 7, 1916-february 12, 1960), lee was the toast of andy warhol's factory. during this time, his work covered three decades of painting, collage, printmaking, sculpture, film and commercial illustration. gay men around the world loved lee for his self-taught and formless 'camp' paintings of men posed in provocative settings. having the two friends share a studio at the bowery ballroom, which galen rowell describes as 'a great dress-up place to create the imagery of the late '40s and early '50s,' impressed both warhol's loyal secretary and the fans of his work. 5ec8ef588b
