The law requires that any firearm shipped to a civilian purchaser for lawful use must be traceable as follows: the shipping information, including the name of the manufacturer, importer, and the party to whom the weapon was shipped, must be recorded. The individual sending the firearm must notify the manufacturer, importer, or dealer to whom the firearm was sent in writing of its intended use, destination, and the number of the serial number it is to bear. Faced with the fact that most firearms recovered at crime scenes in the U.S. are ghost guns, ATF has proposed to require that every unserialized firearm sold to an FFL is required to bear a serial number that is visible, legible, and permanent. The Domestic and International Trafficking in Arms Regulations (TIAR) also requires that the permanent marking on every firearm, whether it is an imported or domestically manufactured firearm, include the manufacturer and model, caliber, finish, and serial number. TIAR further requires that the permanent marking include the caliber, finish, and serial number regardless of whether the firearm is chambered in a military cartridge. Under the law, a serial number is considered permanent if it was applied by a machine or otherwise forged into the weapon. In addition, the regulation allows for a single serial number to be permanently engraved, carved, or otherwise applied to multiple firearms. In the case of multiple firearms bearing the same serial number, the serial number will be entered in the serial number field of the manufacturer record in the National Firearms Registration and Transfer Record database.
