news? Biological sex may be somewhat related to gender identity, but it is far from being limited to just two options (men or women). If you read a news article stating that people are now being born with a third gender, you may be thinking that such a statement is incorrect and should be corrected. It is not, however. Gender identity is actually more complex than just biological sex, so we should not confuse biological sex with gender identity. Please don't confuse the two, as gender identity is a completely different thing that has nothing to do with biological sex. Biological sex is only one of many factors contributing to gender identity. Gender identity is also influenced by the way people see themselves. In addition to biological sex and gender identity, other factors, such as culture and societal expectations, can affect one's gender identity. Hello, I am writing to you in regards to our article published today, please see link: Your article claims that "A newborn baby can produce sperm and eggs as well as produce hormones and change its genitals.". My sister is a biologist and there are various kinds of hormones which can result from all three genders. Hormones are produced by the Sry (sex-determining region) gene on the Y-chromosome. This gene is the same for all males and is located on the Y-chromosome. The female sex-determining gene is the X-chromosome with the presence of one X-chromosome not being required to determine gender. If a person is female, they have a normal Y-chromosome but do not have a second X-chromosome. If a person has both Xchromosomes and a Y-chromosome, then the presence of X-chromosomes makes them male. As such, a person can have a Y-chromosome but no X-chromosome and be female. There are many other factors which can affect gender identity and sexuality. For example, there are many differences in behaviour, bodily characteristics, and sexuality between men and women. Males are usually taller, heavier and stronger than females, and are attracted to other males (for heterosexual men). Females usually tend to be shorter, lighter, and more physically fit than males, and are attracted to other females (for heterosexual females). There are many studies which can be found online. Please do your own research. Thank you for your time, Steven Alder P.S. - I should mention that the common misunderstandings described in my original email are part of what lead me to write this article. Steven
