Photoshop may still be king when it comes to all facets of digital photography, but that doesn't mean the competition has been sluggish. In the past year there have been enough advances in Canon and Nikon's Photoshop clones (including Lightroom and Elements plugins) that it is hard to say who is winning in the battle to be the go-to photo software. That said, Nikon's 1-series software is impressive, and Apple may have made a strong play for the design market with its Aperture and iPhoto products. In any case, the software landscape has changed dramatically for the better. Adobe may be losing its luster, but its software is still king. Photographers flock to Photoshop because its tools can turn a photo into art. But image-editing programs are multiplying, and the days of signing up for the one you love is over. The options simply don't compare, and software buyers need to make an informed choice about the software they choose. Photoshop is still tops, but Photoshop Elements and Lightroom have gotten an overhaul. In any case, you can count on the latest versions to keep the tradition going. By the end of 2019, its total revenues were $5.5 billion, a drop of 11% from 2017. Its quarterly profits have tumbled as well. In fact, in the first quarter of 2019, Adobe's revenues were a mere $101 million, a drop of 41% on the year-ago quarter , and its quarterly profit tumbled 28% to $51 million. In the first quarter of 2017, its revenues had dropped only 6% It's going to be a dark day when Photoshop goes offline. But the software is still king of photo editing. Adroitly handling the workflow of a photographer, it's still the king of photo editing. That won't change until its creator, the British software behemoth Adobe, changes.
