and differentiation. Here, we report that SCF is expressed on a population of B cells that are positively selected in the light zone of germinal centers (GCs), a cellular microenvironment that is more restrictive than follicular dendritic cells (FDC) to productive B cell maturation. In the absence of functional FDC, no B cell populations capable of producing high-affinity antibodies could be detected. The antigen-specific B cells that acquire a memory phenotype within the GC exhibit reactivity similar to memory B cells of previous memory B cell populations. Importantly, the memory-like phenotype of the B cells within the GC is functionally relevant. Memory B cells that initially arise within the GC can become primed for a rapid and efficient secondary response to antigen challenge. These studies show that SCF is a molecule that is essential for the survival and differentiation of B cells within the GC, and demonstrate a function for this cytokine that is independent of FDC.
