Another neat feature in Photoshop CC, is that you can now find a person's favorite color with Adobe's People tag feature. Just type the person's name in the Find People under Education tool to retrieve their favorite color. The results show the color name and the person's personal Color Theory lessons, which can be applied to future images. People tags here, too, work similarly to Adobe's Photo Albums. You can tag people to add them to a group, and then send that group's photo albums to your email Inbox. Since one-on-one person tagging has changed to the more social function, and since creating a Color Study of your own is now more of a social affair, I think the new emulated group functions could be powerful tools for sales and marketing. It's also cool how you can create a Style from one of several templates in a gallery, or one of your own. Best of all, you can preview the results right inside Photoshop. This makes it easy to see whether a Style is suited to your personal style or not. You can also add labels, and move Elements panels to and from a Style. When you go to create a Style, you select or add components like shadows, highlights, and so on. Add these to your Style, and then you can give one Style a whole gallery of colors to become a Color Style. Or add a "Copy" and "Paste" function to the Style modules, allowing you to easily create multiple Color Styles. Colors are grouped by hue, value, or saturation, and then the function to select from a gallery applies color shades automatically.
