The company integrated a feature that allows you to have a virtual “Photoshop Express” on your computer. This way, you can try out any available Photoshop feature while keeping your actual Photoshop open and untouched. It’s a wonderful idea, but it’s not always the most stable. There’s a certain amount of déjà vu that comes with Photoshop; not because it’s reminiscent of the final release of the program, but rather that the basic features worked almost perfectly in the Photoshop 6 era, and yet a lot of them had to be rebuilt in Photoshop 7. The new techniques in Adobe’s Photoshop especially the ones that support the iPad Pro and the Apple pencil are a refreshing change, and I’m sure it will suit a few users. And for most of the rest of us we’ll continue with the current workflow, which suits our needs. Anyway I’m looking forward to the product even with an iPhone camera right now. The fact that it can run on my Mac and my PC is impressive. My iPhone 5S I can’t even use that for photography, it’s just shy of being useful. I’m giving Photoshop a try for the first time in a few hours and I love it already so it’s already a win. That being said, I realize there are other alternatives to Photoshop among Mac owners as well as Windows users. But in the DSLR world, there’s no substitute for Photoshop when it comes to RAW images. And to be honest, I don’t use Photoshop or Lightroom. I think they’re great, and I might upgrade to Lightroom 4.0 for Windows later this year. But for now, Elements remains my tool of choice.
